EDITO

Some events are becoming more frequent in Europe, sometimes violent, which show how much it is still necessary to reconcile our European societies with their cultural diversity.

ANIMA has long been a promoter and active mobiliser of capital, skill, technology and trade flows between the Mediterranean diaspora talents and their countries of origin, as we know that these flows promote development in the partner countries of our network.

At the same time we can see that these talents from the diaspora based in Europe are leading, thanks to the link they keep with the countries of origin, concrete, visible and measurable actions, which contribute to the influence, attractiveness, and competitiveness of their country of residence. These actions also contribute to strengthening intercultural dialogue.

So let us be careful not to consider the diaspora only for its possible contribution to development. It is also important, for the appeasement of European societies, to recognise and value the benefits for Europe of its role, in particular as a gateway and ambassador.
